My name's Bill Billeter. I'm a former infantry officer and currently an operations manager with Hajoca. As a transitioning veteran, I struggled to reconnect with a sense of purpose. I wanted to be a part of something that mattered, and to be in a role of influence and responsibility. Ultimately, I chose Hajoca because leading with a measure of autonomy is important to me, as is the very real potential for growth, reward, and advancement with Hajoca's business model.

Our small Profit Center here in Glasgow, Kentucky is growing. It's exciting to be a part of building this business, and boosting its profitability and market share. Every day here is different, and every day I have the opportunity to influence all aspects of our operation, from inventory management, to sales and marketing, to creating a culture of customer focus.

One of the first things I noticed about our company is that long-term Hajoca employees say things like, "What a great company we work for," or "I wish I had joined Hajoca sooner." These comments are sincere and they say a lot about our culture.

So if you're a transitioning veteran or a veteran who's looking for your next opportunity, I encourage you to take a look at Hajoca. This is an organization where those with our skills and experience can be successful from day one.
